

Plato's Dungeon Raid

KayfaBINGO!

Stay
fluffy!

Bring Your Own Legend

Thirteen classes. Four levels each.

BLÖDSINN!

What the
FLUFF?!

You have played all of them.

The First-Day Fighter

POWER: You pick the class with no spells and no gimmick. You hit things with a sword.

LORE: Every party needs the one who read none of the rulebook and still showed up on time.

The Second-Wind Fighter

POWER: You catch your breath mid-fight. You are somehow still standing.

LORE: The fighter's superpower is not dying when everyone had already written him off.

The Action-Surge Fighter

POWER: You take two turns in one. Nobody questions how.

LORE: While the casters debated the lore, the fighter solved the problem. Twice.

The Secretly-Carries-The-Party Fighter

POWER: You did the most damage all campaign. No one noticed.

LORE: The class with no story is the one the story could not happen without.

The First-Rage Barbarian

POWER: You rage. You go in first. You ask questions never.

LORE: Every barbarian's first session begins with a door that did not need breaking.

The Reckless Barbarian

POWER: You trade your defense for damage. You consider this a good deal.

LORE: The barbarian found the button that makes the numbers bigger. The barbarian presses the button.

KayfaBONGO!

The Load-Bearing Barbarian

POWER: The party sends you into every room first. You believe this is honor.

LORE: A hero who solves problems by hitting them will be handed every problem.

What the
FLUFF?!

The Weather-Event Barbarian

POWER: You rage again. There was no cooldown anyway.

LORE: At high enough level, the barbarian stops being a character and becomes

DM:
Tooks,
other words

The Cantrip Wizard

POWER: You throw a tiny magic dart. You have four hit points.
LORE: The wizard begins as the smartest person in the room and the easiest to kill.

The One-Spell Wizard

POWER: You have the perfect spell for this. You used it last encounter.
LORE: A wizard's power is infinite, in theory, once per day.

The Well-Actually Wizard

POWER: You correct the DM on the lore. You are right. It does not help.
LORE: Knowing exactly how the world works is not the same as surviving it.

The Glass-Cannon Wizard

POWER: You end the encounter in one spell. You also end yourself in one hit.
LORE: At high level the wizard is a god, between naps.

THE SORCERER

The Accidental Sorcerer

POWER: You did magic. You don't know how. You did not study.
LORE: The wizard earned it. The sorcerer woke up with it and never let the wizard forget.

The Wild-Magic Sorcerer

POWER: You cast a spell. The DM rolls on a table. Everyone holds their breath.
LORE: Innate power comes with innate consequences and no instruction manual.

The No-Study-Required Sorcerer

POWER: You out-cast the wizard while eating. The wizard files a complaint.
LORE: Talent is the only thing more annoying than the person who has it.

The Surge-And-Pray Sorcerer

POWER: You reshape the spell mid-cast. It might fireball the party.
LORE: Raw power never asked permission and never reads the room.

THE CLERIC

The Drafted Cleric

POWER: You wanted to fight. The party voted you the healer.
LORE: Nobody chooses to be the medic. The party chooses for them.

The Triage Cleric

POWER: You heal the loudest first. Volume is not the same as injury.
LORE: A healer learns whom to save by who screams the most convincingly.

The Judgmental Cleric

POWER: You heal the rogue. You make sure the rogue knows how you feel about it.
LORE: Divine mercy comes with a free divine opinion.

The Last-Resort Cleric

POWER: You are out of spells. The party turns to you anyway.
LORE: Everyone forgets the cleric exists until the exact moment they need her.

THE DRUID

KayfaBIZARRO!

The Foraging Druid

POWER: You identify every plant. You eat the wrong one anyway.
LORE: The druid knows the forest intimately and trusts it completely, which is the problem.

The Wildshape Druid

POWER: You turn into a bear. You will be solving most problems as a bear now.
LORE: Give a druid one animal form and every encounter becomes that animal.

What the FLUFF?!

The Eco-Sermon Druid

POWER: You stop the raid to explain why the dungeon is unsustainable.
LORE: No one invited the lecture. The lecture comes free with the nature magic.

The Permanently-A-Bear Druid

POWER: You have not been a person in three sessions. The party has stopped asking.
LORE: A druid who can be anything will, eventually, just be the bear.

What the FLUFF?!

THE ROGUE

The Trap-Checking Rogue

POWER: You check every door, chest, and floor tile for traps. The party waits.
LORE: The rogue's first level is mostly the party standing in a hallway.

The Sneak-Attack Rogue

POWER: You stab it once for damage the fighter dreams about.
LORE: The rogue does nothing for five rounds and then settles the whole fight.

The Steals-From-The-Party Rogue

POWER: You loot the body before the party reaches it. You looted the party too.
LORE: A rogue does not distinguish between enemy pockets and friendly ones.

The I Was Never Here Rogue

POWER: You vanish before the consequences arrive. The blame lands on the bard.
LORE: The perfect heist leaves no evidence, only a confused bard.

THE RANGER

The Tracking Ranger

POWER: You read the trail. You know what passed, when, and how it felt about it.
LORE: The ranger sees a story in the mud that no one asked him to narrate.

The Favored-Enemy Ranger

POWER: You chose goblins as your sworn nemesis at character creation.
LORE: A ranger prepares perfectly for the one enemy he will never meet.

The Useless-In-Town Ranger

POWER: You have no idea how to talk to a shopkeeper. You offer to track him instead.
LORE: The wilderness expert becomes furniture the moment there is a roof.

The Upstaged-By-His-Wolf Ranger

POWER: Your animal companion does the cool thing. Everyone pets the wolf. Not you.
LORE: The ranger spent four levels becoming the second most interesting member of his own duo.

THE BARD

The Open-Mic Bard

POWER: You perform for the tavern. Some of them even wanted you to.
LORE: Every bard's career begins with an audience that did not consent.

The Inspiration Bard

POWER: You tell the fighter he's doing great. The fighter rolls better. Science cannot explain it.
LORE: The bard's true magic is making other people slightly more confident than they should be.

The I Seduce It Bard

POWER: You attempt to romance the quest-giver, the villain, and the dragon. In that order.
LORE: The bard has never met a plot he could not complicate with flirtation.

The Legend-In-His-Own-Songs Bard

POWER: You write the ballad of the campaign. You are the hero of every verse.
LORE: History is written by the bard, which is why the bard always wins it.

What the
FLUFF?!

THE PALADIN

The Freshly-Sworn Paladin

POWER: You take the oath. You mean every word with your whole heart.
LORE: The paladin's oath is the most sincere thing at a table built on lying to a DM.

The Smiting Paladin

POWER: You pour every spell slot into one holy hit. The undead simply leaves.
LORE: The paladin saves it all up for one righteous moment and spends it loudly.

The Unwanted-Conscience Paladin

POWER: You remind the party that stealing is wrong. The party was mid-steal.
LORE: Every party gets the conscience it deserves and none of them wanted.

The Technically-Still-Lawful Paladin

POWER: You found a loophole in your own oath. You are still good. Mostly.
LORE: The longer the oath holds, the more creative the holding becomes.

HUMBUG!

MORALLY
SIDE-EYED

THE MONK

The Barefoot Monk

POWER: You have no armor and no weapon. You have a philosophy and bad feet.

LORE: The monk arrives at the dungeon dressed for a completely different occasion.

The Flurry Monk

POWER: You punch four times in the time it takes the fighter to swing once.

LORE: Nobody respected the punching class until the punching started.

The Underestimated Monk

POWER: You deflect the arrow, walk on the water, and say something cryptic.

LORE: The monk spends the whole campaign being a surprise to people who read his sheet.

The Dragon-Punching Monk

POWER: You punch the dragon. The dragon was not built for this matchup.

LORE: At high level there is no problem the monk cannot solve by hitting it with his hands specifically.

THE WARLOCK

KayfaBIZARRO!

BLÖDSINN!

The Eager-Pact Warlock

POWER: You sign the deal for power. You skim the terms.

LORE: The warlock got everything everything he wanted and one clause he did not read.

The Eldritch-Blast Warlock

POWER: You fire the same beam again. You will fire it every turn forever.

LORE: Give a warlock one good attack and he will never learn another.

The Demanding-Patron Warlock

POWER: Your patron whispers a side-quest mid-dungeon. You cannot say no.

LORE: Power on loan comes with a landlord who visits without warning.

The Pact-Came-Due Warlock

POWER: Your patron arrives to collect. You are now part of the dungeon.

LORE: Every warlock learns the same lesson on the last page of the contract.

DON'T READ THE FINE PRINT!

THE NECROMANCER

The Grave-Robbing Necromancer

POWER: You loot the cemetery for parts. You call it research.

LORE: The necromancer's hobby is everyone else's nightmare and he cannot understand why.

The Not-Invited Necromancer

POWER: You bring your skeletons to the tavern. The party sits at the other table.

LORE: The necromancer is the only class whose party-balance problem is social.

The First-Skeleton Necromancer

POWER: You raise your first skeleton. You named it. You are attached now.

LORE: A necromancer's first creation is the first friend who could not leave.

The Army-Of-One Necromancer

POWER: You command two hundred undead. You have never been more alone.

LORE: A man who builds his own company has only the company he built.

KayfaBONGO!

HUMBUG!

DON'T READ THE FINE PRINT

GW

Georg v. Westphalen

FRIZZLEBOB'S GUIDE TO BEING A DUNGEON MASTER

FrizzleBob, the Over-Prepared DM

POWER: You write forty pages of lore. The players will read none of it.
LORE: Every DM begins by mistaking the module for the campaign.

FrizzleBob, the Improvising DM

POWER: The players go left. Everything you prepared was to the right. You smile and invent a town.
LORE: A DM's real skill is named "yes, and" and learned the hard way.

FrizzleBob, the Railroad-Tempted DM

POWER: You feel the urge to force the plot. You resist. Mostly.
LORE: The hardest roll a DM makes is the one against his own outline.

FrizzleBob, the Alchemist-DM

POWER: You set the table. The players arrive. You do not pretend to know what happens next.
LORE: Stay fluffy.

